Responding in Kind? When Democracies Repress as a Response to Civil Unrest

In this paper I show that democratic leaders are increasingly likely to use repression, especially in forms of censorship and violent repression, as the threat to public security increases. Democratic leaders need legitimacy in the form of a serious threat to public security before they can repress. Given the opportunity, democratic leaders will repress in order to increase security. This adds to the literature of findings that as the public perceives greater threats they are more willing to exchange civil liberties for security.
